He was reared on a farm, received a common school education, and at the age of twenty years taught school. He attended the law school at Cumberland university, Lebanon, Tenn., was graduated in January, 1857, and in February of that year removed to Decatur, where he lived, with the exception of six months spent in Texas in 1860, until the outbreak of the War of Secession. In November, 1903, he was appointed judge of the sixteenth judicial district, and was nominated in the Democratic primary, 1904, but the act creating the office was declared unconstitutional in the fall of 1904.
